Inclusive education (IE) is an excellent innovative paradigm from educational development strategies perspective to support the successful implementation of the Education for All program in line with the principle of Human and Child Rights.

Putting the IE into practice is not an easy task because of the varied conditions of the countries throughout the world, especially developing countries. Differences may be closely interrelated to the various constrains concerning socio-cultural (attitudinal), socio-economical (lack of resources), and leadership-managerial (policy- institutional) factors in the respective country. Nevertheless, previous studies have indicated that the implementation of the IE idea has to some extend and lesser degree, contributed significantly to the better achievement of educational (EFA) objectives, in both development and modern countries.

In 2004-2005, an evaluation study has been conducted under the-auspicious of Indonesia University of Education, concerning the effectiveness various pilot project leading to the in the implementation of IE in Indonesia. Those projects have been organized under the sponsorship and cooperation between Indonesian and Braillo Norway in addition to CRICED University of Tsukuba Japan. The Results of the study essentially tend to support the success of IE as previously mentioned. This implies that the international cooperation should be urgently promoted, and successful IE experiences sharing among countries is thus very important (Abin, 2005: i).

Social and Emotional Development

In terms of social aspects of child and youth development, there are three main areas that have been under consideration: inclusion and community building; character-building; and delinquency and community safety.

Social cohesion Inclusion and community building

The role of sport in inclusion has shown to be strongly linked to building social cohesion and social capital among young people and adults in communities. Sport has been used as a practical tool to engage young people in their communities through volunteering, resulting in higher levels of leadership, community engagement and altruism among young people.

Positive relationships between young people are encouraged through physical activity and coaching is considered a key aspect of how physical activity can contribute to social inclusion among young people.

Social inclusion also related to offering equal opportunities to sport and education programs regardless of gender, ethnicity or ability. There is increasing attention on program development both in and out of schools for example, to include girls, people with disabilities and refugees.

Character-building

The reasoning is that moral behavior is acquired through social interaction that occurs through sport and physical activity conducted in a collective. Whether or not sport has a positive impact on character- building in individual is highly dependent on the context of the program and the values promoted and developed.

In this respect, physical educators, coaches, trainers or community leaders have a determining influence on a young person's sporting experience and on the degree of "character building" that can arise. Some research also indicates that physical activity outside of competitive sport may be more effective in promoting mutual understanding and empathy among young people.

Delinquency and community safety

Research suggests that sport can be used as a means to reduce deviant behavior among children and youth. But participating in physical activity does not directly impact on deviant behavior. Accordingly, programmes should combine sports and physical activities with leadership and job-skills development and training to address risk factors in children and youth.

The majority of programmes that target delinquent youth aim to act as either:

Diversions for delinquent youth away from other delinquent youth or behaviors; rehabilitations activities for those previously involved in delinquent behavior; or gateways to engage the target group in sport in order to establish

How to Build Character Through Integrity

The wonderful thing about character and integrity, which are intimately related, is that they're one of the few things in life that no one will ever be able to forcefully take away from you. Your choices are your own. Even if someone can take your life, they can't force you to make a choice that you believe is wrong.

There are some steps that you may follow to improve yourself by building your character. Each of them takes time to fully understand and apply towards your life. Learn about your own virtues and values, and how they correspond to your life and the world around you. And those steps are:

1. Understand what character and integrity are. Some times, the definition of these two words are stretched or misrepresented Character is the sum of qualities show up in a person or group, moral or ethical strength, and the description of a person's attributes, traits and abilities. Character is who you are. It defines you and guides you actions, hopefully in a positive way. <02>The world championship was in the balance when Briana Scurry, the American goalkeeper, strode the goal line on July 10 in the Rose Bowl. The American goalkeeper had picked out her victim, the third Chinese player to take a penalty kick in the shootout, that would decide the Women's World Cup.....it was one thing to choose which opponent was most likely to be weak. It was another thing for Scurry to choose her tactics By her own admission, Scurry decided to improve her chances by ignoring the rules of the penalty kick. In a quick and practiced move, Scurry bolted two steps forward-in violation of the rule-and cut off the angle for Liu Ying, her opponent. With superb reflexes, Scurry than dived to her left and tipped Liu's shot wide of the goal. That one stop would shortly give the U.S. the championship....Scurry's position was stakes out soon after the final game when she told The Los Angeles Times: "Everybody does it. It's only cheating if you get caught" (Doty, 2006:2).

The significance and importance of character are hardly an arguable point. Although this point is not empirically based, it is so well established in society that it can not (should not) be argued. The characters of persons, in conjunction with their personalities, make up who they are and how they act. Additionally, who they are and how they act are important because the daily lives of people involve interactions with other people. Consequently, in all aspects of society-politics, business, education, relationships, religion, and entertainment-the character of individuals (along with their personalities) plays a significant role in influencing the nature and quality (positive or negative) of human interactions. A person's character is indisputably an important part of who a person is and how that person interacts with others. (Doty, 2006).

However, while character is often exalted, discussed, and studied, it is rare when people can agree to what character actually is. People can certainly agree that character is of utmost importance. However, they will be just as quick to disagree on exactly what character is.

The numerous definitions of character come from variety of sources-none of which are necessarily wrong. Philosophers have tended to define character from an esoteric perspective and have considered both life in general as well as a person's behaviors and actions. For example:

The shortest and surest way to live with honor in the world is to be in reality what we would appear to be. All human virtues increase and strengthen themselves by the practice and experience of them.

What you are doing speaks so loudly that I can't hear what you're saying.

Scholars often take a more theoretical perspective in defining character. Some refer to character as an internal state that is manifested in behavior. This internal state guides decisions and actions while defining the qualities that make up a person's nature. Other experts indicate that character is the inner dimensions of a person in which the processes of moral action become one's behavior. Other definitions of character are the sum of a person's moral qualities. Moreover, some believe that a person of character seeks the truth, decides what is right, and has the courage and commitment to act accordingly.

According to some scholars, an effective and common way to discuss character, and what it is, is from a virtue and/or trait approach. People with good character come to possess a wide range of virtues and are willingly disposed to act upon them both in their own long-term interests as well as in the interests of others. A person of character displays traits of respect, integrity, honesty, responsibility, courage, compassion, fairness, and civility.

Sport character in terms of four virtues: compassion, fairness, sportsmanship, and integrity, and believe that the possession of these qualities or virtues facilitates the consistent display of moral action in sport. Within the sport world, many successful coaches have long personified and taught the virtues of character in sport. The legendary basketball coach at UCLA, John Wooden, addressed the importance of character and what character does for man individual by stating that “ability may get you to the top, but it takes character to keep you there”. He also said “be more concerned with your character than your reputation, because your reputation is what people may think of you, while your character is who you really are”. Other believes that a person’s character is reflected in how he or she reacts to difficult and trying situation.

In military, character is defined as how a person acts when no one is looking. In practice, this translates to what a person does-how he or she acts. The United States Army uses the following seven traits as the minimum acceptable standards of conduct and behavior-which define a person of character: loyalty, duty, respect, selfless service, honesty, integrity, and personal courage. To more accurately define character, it is helpful to breakdown it down (as with any psychological construct) into the latent traits that reflect the construct. The person of character displays behaviors that show respect and integrity in a sport setting (or lack of character if the behaviors are disrespectful or lack integrity).

A Model for the Construct of Character:

Character (construct)

Respect (latent trait)

Integrity (latent trait)

Respect is how treat and regard others. Respect is a verb, it is something you do or fail to do. Respect is to feel or show deferential regard for others. It is the regard for the fundamental worth and dignity of every human being. Many people refer to respect as “The Golden Rule”. Respect is not something one can imitate, but something one must embody and it is maintained by the respectful acts of individuals.

These definitions include respect for teammates, opponents, fans, coaches, and referees. For examples, respectful behaviors include shaking hands, helping a teammate or opponent, and listening. Behaviors that show a lack of respect include taunting, trash talking, yelling at a coach or referee, cheating, or running up the score against an inferior opponent.

Some may argue that respect in sport primarily means how an athlete approaches both the game and his or her opponent. A lack of respect would be treating one’s opponent as a mere means to the goal of victory, the objectification of opponent.

Integrity is steadfast adherence to a strict moral or ethical code, being unimpaired, sound, whole and undivided; completeness. Or, in other word, integrity is doing the right thing for the right reason even when no one is watching.

Integrity refers to doing what is right in word and deed. It is a steadfast adherence to a strict moral or ethical code. If a person is doing and or saying what is right, he or she is acting with integrity. This definition of integrity also includes, but is not limited to, not lying, cheating, or stealing. Integrity entails a sense of duty or doing what an individual is supposed to be doing, that is, being responsible. In a sport context, integrity includes being on time to a practice, being prepared for practice, obeying a coach's instructions, and giving one's best effort in practice and games.

2. Choose a set of rules, morals, or principles that you believe will lead to a happy, satisfying, and righteous life, as well as a better world. You can subscribe to the ethics of a particular religion, or you can develop your own, based on your experiences.
3. Look at the choices you've made in you past, and observe how much you have or haven't lived by those principles. Don't waste time feeling regretful or guilty. Remember that ".....until a person can say deeply and honestly, I am what I am today because of the choices I made yesterday, that person cannot say otherwise". Stephen R. Covey.
4. Decide what you must change in your behavior to align your life more closely to what you believe.
5. Be conscious every day of the decisions you make, however big or small, and how close they bring you to the person you really want to be.

One may be remember from an event, that there was a man who walked through a hall comforting others, giving away their last piece of bread. They may have been a few in number, but they offer sufficient proof that everything can be taken from a man but one thing: the last human freedom-to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances-to choose one's own way.

Beware of people who'll tray and convince you to give up on your character or integrity, saying that nobody's perfect, and taunting you for being such an idealist. The fact that nobody's perfect doesn't mean violating that you believe is right. It's good to learn from our mistakes, but we don't always need to make mistakes in order to learn. Remember that striving to be perfect and being perfect are two different ideas; the former is integrity, the latter is futility.

Your character is unique. It may not match with anybody else. So do not try for it. Build it on the basis of your own aptitude and inner light within you. Self assessment, self evaluation, introspection etc., work well, but never get disheartened by petty failure and criticism revolving around failures. Stand firm on your convictions. You are bound to succeed.

Does Sport Affect Character Development in Athletes?

The origins of Sport as a Character Builder

Sport historian Donald Mrozek (1983) contends that at the beginning of the 19th century, there was no obvious merit in sport-certainly no clear social value to it and no sense that it contributed to the improvement of the individual's character. But in England during the mid-1800s a tradition arose that profoundly influenced sporting practice in the United States. With the emergence of student sport teams in British private secondary boarding school for boys, school sport won recognition as a medium for socialization, enculturation, and social control and they became imbued with a moralistic ideology.

Sports played by British students gradually became valued by the headmasters (school principals) more for the qualities of social character they were presumed to develop than for the physical exercise they provided. In a description of British boarding school sports, a sociologist observed that they were considered an excellent way to develop moral authority and exemplary character in England's evolving ruling class... Here the ideal was intended to allow boys to prove themselves as potential leaders on the playing fields through moral courage, devoted team work, and group spirit.

The notion that school sports developed character was pragmatically related to the expansion of British Empire (Kingdom), which requires self-confident soldiers, administrators, and businessmen capable of withstanding the physical and psychological demands of their occupations. Graduates of British private boarding schools became leaders in many spheres of life-government, the military, domestic industry, commerce...throughout the British Kingdom. These young men were destined to govern and control.

Although no one ever empirically verified the social-developmental effects of school sport, belief that sport did develop favorable character traits was unshakable in Britain. A popular saying in England that the Battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton (a private boarding school) suggested that Arthur Wellington, the victorious British general at the Battle of Waterloo, had acquired skills and values while playing sport at Eton that prepared him to defeat Napoleon. In fact, though, there is compelling evidence that as soon an adolescent attending Eton, Lord Wellington did not play sports. There were no compulsory, organized games at Eton while he was there and even the most casual cricket or boating contest did not attract his participation.

Like so many ideas and practices of the British upper class, the character-building theme of sports was exported to America, even though the cultural milieu and social meaning that prevailed in British private school did not and do not underlie American youth and school sport programs (Sage,1998).

With the incredible popularity of sport worldwide, character development is (and should be) a part of the sport experience-at the youth, collegiate, and professional levels. According to Piagetian theory, a benefit of physical activity is that an individual's psychological processes and structures will grow. Sport is a reflection of the value trends occurring in society. Sport is an environment that symbolizes cultural values and is a medium through which young people learn about and experience many of the core values of our society. These experiences are major part of their character development. Sport does not build character (5). Character can be taught and learned in a sport setting. A sport experience can build character, but only if the environment is structured and a stated and planned goal is to develop character. This kind of environment must include all individuals (coaches, administrations, parents, etc) who are stakeholders in the sport setting. Recommended sport setting gives participants reward more for how they play, sportsmanship, rather than for winning and losing. Other experts clearly believe that positive character traits (such as personal and social responsibility) can and should be taught and learn in sport or physical activity setting. Sport programs at all levels can be specifically designed to develop both an active life style and positive character traits. The goal in these settings is that appropriate and responsible behaviors and values

Abstract

Sport/physical activity does not build character. But character can be taught and learned in a sport or physical activity setting. A sport experience can build character, but only if the environment is structured and a stated and planned goal is to develop character.

Recommended sport or physical activity setting gives participants reward more for how they play, sportsmanship, rather than for winning or losing. The goal in these settings is that appropriate and responsible behaviors and values. In this respect, physical educators, coaches, trainers or community leaders have a determining influence on a young person's sporting experience and on the degree of character building that can arise. Physical activity outside of competitive sport may be more effective in promoting mutual understanding and empathy among young people. A person's character includes loyalty, duty, respect, selfless service, honesty, integrity, and personal courage. A person's character is reflected in how he or she reacts to difficult and trying situations.

Inclusive education is an excellent innovative paradigm from educational strategies perspective to support the successful implementation of the Education for All program in line with the principle of Human and Child Rights. Social interaction that occurs in sport and physical activity conducted in a collective, and highly dependent on the context of the program and the values promoted, has a positive impact on character building in individuals.
