DEMOCRACY

One of the types of government and the one in which we are most interested, places complete control in the hands of the people who are governed. We call this type of government a democracy. The people, since they themselves control the government, make their own laws and decide what rights they are to have, what powers the government may exercise, and what services the government is to give them.

Sometimes all the voters in a democracy, if it is a small one, come together in a meeting to make their decisions directly. This is the direct or “town meeting” type of democracy. It is also called “pure democracy”. The chief advantage of pure democracy is that people rule themselves directly and not through representatives. Unfortunately it is inconvenient or impossible to get a very large number of people together for this type of government. Therefore, we find direct democracy only in small communities.

Democracies with large number of people have a representative type of government. The voters elect a few of their fellow citizens to attend meetings and to make decisions for all the people. The officers we elect represent us; they decide what to do about governmental problems. Because they are our representatives, we say that this government is a representative democracy. Today mostly state in the world has a representative legislature.

The representatives and officers we elect are controlled in what they do. We exercise this control primarily through constitutions and elections. A constitution is the fundamental law of government, which may be expressed in a written document or through a country’s laws, customs and institutions. It describes how a government is organized, who the principal officers are to be, who may hold office, and what powers they may exercise. The constitution limits the government and its officials in order to protect the people from unjust use of these powers. Through regular and frequent elections we decide who are to be our representatives. We vote some good persons to be the members of parliament or representative legislature, so the controlling can be done.
